

This is a wonderfully inventive concept! "Past, Present, Future" has a rich, poetic premise. Blending historical eras through the physical medium of "spacetime wood" guitars creates an instant, tangible hook. The duo's name, "Tab and Coda," is a brilliant musical pun. "Tab" grounds them in the practical reading of music, while "Coda" represents the bringing of a piece to an end—highly fitting for a story dealing with mortality and time. 🔗

The contrast between the 1st-Century Middle East and the 21st-Century Midwest offers a massive sonic and cultural playground. Merging ancient modal music with modern Western styles inside the dramatic, emotional landscape of 19th-Century Romanticism provides incredible creative opportunities.

Narrative & Theme Breakdown

- The Conflict: The Timeharmonic Orchestra is a fantastic antagonistic force. They personify the rigid, cosmic structure of time, contrasting beautifully with the free-spirited, improvisational nature of our protagonist musicians.
- The Emotional Core: "Becoming the right people at the wrong time" perfectly encapsulates the bittersweet romance. It highlights that while their love is timeless, their existence is bound by the laws of chronology.
- The Aesthetic: The focus on nature in music pairs beautifully with the Romantic era (think Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony or the poetry of Wordsworth), which actively rebelled against industrialization by championing the organic world. 🔗

Creative Directions to Explore

To build out this universe, we can look at the mechanics of their journey:

- The Sonic Fusion: How Tabitha's ancient strings (perhaps reminiscent of an Oud or ancient Lyre techniques applied to her guitar) blend with Dakota's modern Midwestern influences (like blues, indie rock, or folk).
- The Spacetime Instruments: The limitations, rules, and unique sounds of guitars carved from the fabric of reality itself.
- The Repertoire: The specific songs they write to survive in the 19th century while secretly coding messages to find a way home.
